Maira Arif

Navigating the Web: My Introduction to Internet Governance

Up until recently, the whole idea of internet governance was a bit of a mystery to me. It's a big field with a lot going on, and I didn't really know much about it before attending a workshop. The workshop opened my eyes to the vastness of this dynamic world and got me thinking about how I can fit into it.

Now, armed with this new knowledge, I'm on a journey to figure out where I can contribute best. The workshop gave me some direction and made me realize that internet governance is always changing, so staying up-to-date is crucial. It's like a constant learning adventure, and I'm up for the challenge.

One thing that's close to my heart is making sure my visually impaired community knows what's going on in this digital world. I want to break down the complicated stuff and share it in a way that everyone can understand, ensuring that no one gets left behind.

The workshop also got me reading about international organizations involved in internet governance, like the International Telecommunication Union (ITU) and the Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers (ICANN). Learning about their roles and how they impact the digital world has broadened my view.

As I step into this new journey, I'm excited about what lies ahead. My goal is to stay informed, make a positive impact, and help my community understand the digital landscape. The road might be big and ever-changing, but with this newfound knowledge, I'm ready to explore the world of internet governance.